THE PATH TOWARDS PEACE

"Whether peace comes or not as a result of the Portsmouth conference, the steps towards some agreement are already clear as well as the character of the treaty likely at last to be made.

"The instrument now forming does far more than adjust the controversy between Japan and Russia. It decides the future of China. It settles the lines on which East Asia is to develop. It marks out the relation which the United States, England and even Germany and France are to have to that development. It is a world treaty. It settles world relations.

"In such an instrument Japan cannot act alone or independent of other lands. The articles agreed upon already yield all that Japan demanded before the war. The evacuation of Manchuria, Port Arthur and the Liao Tung peninsula, the release of the trunk line of Manchuria from Russian domination and "preponderance" in Korea—these were the demands of Japan when war opened.

"They have all been yielded. The articles that remains undecided, and in two instances undiscussed, are the fruit and spoil of war. The two major items, reimbursement for the cost of the war and Sakhalin, no plenipotentiary in Count Komura's place could afford to waive and none in M. Witte's to concede. If a statesman called to the issue of war and peace in a conference like that at Portsmouth, by his firmness, bring war his judgment may in the future be condemned, but his patriotism will never be impugned. Let a man, however, at such a pass waive terms his countrymen demand, or concede terms they condemn as disgraceful and whatever the result no future proof that his judgment was sound will prevent his patriotism from being assailed.

"At such a juncture it is natural that both envoys throw the responsibility on the sovereigns they represent. Terms M. Witte cannot afford to accept the Czar can. Conditions Baron Komura could not venture to modify the Mikado can change to modify Russian resistence or adjust to meet Russian punctilio.

"Both envoys are in hourly conference with their Governments and their sovereigns. Both known what concessions can be made, through either looking to the future can well hesitate themselves to make them. Were both Governments equally determined not to yield no reference would be made to Czar or Mikado, as is now expected after adjournment on the articles on which "divergence" exists.

"If such a reference is made it is because some adjustment is seen to be possible, though one neither envoy could afford to make for himself. At St. Petersburg or at Tokia, more probably at St. Petersburg than at Tokia, the demand or the rejection at Portsmouth is to be modified.

"All signs point in this direction. Nothing is certain. War may continue. But the marshaled opinion of the world neither combatant can disregard. This demands peace, and demands it substantially on the terms of Japan. Russia is left with a full future in the East. The railroad from Harbin to Vladivostok, the share of Manchura under Russia influence, the coast line approaching Korea with its ports, Port Lazareff among others—these are all left to Russia. As Japan has already secured all it demand in the peace of Shimoseki, so Russia retains all that Russia origanally held.

"To such an adjustment Russia cannot object, nor taking Russian action from 1895 to 1904 can just protest be made to the reimbursement of the cost of a war the action brought, or to the retention of Sakhalin, though the latter is of two little value to make it an obstacle to peace. Neither Power would have gone to war over Sakhalin. Why continue at war over it?"—Phila. Press.

PENINSULA PARAGRAPHS

The largest crop of peaches in Kent County, Md., is claimed by Oliver Miller, of near Tolchester, who estimates it at 1,600 baskets.

Members of the Grand Army of the Republic in Delaware are making arrangements to attend the national encampment to be held in Denver, Col., during the first week of September.

David A. Andrew, 28 years old, a farmer of Chapel district, Talbot County, who resided on the farm of his mother, Mrs. Sarah Andrew, near the village of Old Chapel, commited suicide Tuesday afternoon by shooting himself.

The tomato canneries throughout Delaware began operations for the season this week. The yield will not be large owing to the packers failing to offer tempting prices to farmers last winter.

In less than three weeks, the time granted counsel for John M. Simpers, the condemned murderer of the late Hon. Albert Constable, of Elkton, in which to file their bill of exceptions noted during the progress of the trial before the Circuit Court for Cecil county, last March, will expire. Simpers' counsel is preparing to take the case to the Court of Appeals.

A State jurisdiction of the Patriotic Order Sons of America, will be formed at Dover next month. Because of a healthy growth in the organization's membership the executive committe has decided to institute this State camp at Dover, on Tuesday, September 12th. Over 100 delegates will be present and the hall of Dover Conclave, Improved Order of Heptasophs, has been engaged.

Friendless and despondent over her first wayward step, May Messick, a 14-year-old servant girl in the family of Mr. and Mrs. Pius Wolf, of Laurel, made three attempts to end her life, on Tuesday evening, but was frustrated in the attempts by citizens and officers. Luther E. Hearn, whom she charges with being the cause of her downfall, is now held in $500 bail for the next term of the Court of General Sessions in Sussex County in connection with the case.

The Marydel Camp, in Daily's woods, near Marydel, which was started last year under the direction of Rev. E. H. Collins, pastor of Marydel Circuit, and which was such a success, has been resumed this year and thus far has exceeded all expectations of the managers and the earnest, hard working pastor. The camp has been considerably enlarged from that of last year. More tents have been erected, the circle enlarged and a fine auditorium built in the center of the grounds.

Farms in Delaware are in big demand, for the western farmers find that Delaware soil is suitable for more than one or two crops. The custom of wheat, corn and hay farming, in vogue years ago, is dead in lower Delaware. The farm which gave a poor crop of corn is now paying a handsome dividend in small fruits, sweet potatoes and other crops. Real estate agents at Dover, Milford and other State towns are kept busy in arranging sales of Delaware farms to western and Canadian farmers.

Bowers' Beach saw one of the biggest and best-natured crowds on "Big Thursday" last week that has ever visited that popular bayside resort. Farmers from all over the country, free from their work in the harvest fields, gathered at old Bowers to take an annual outing with their families and friends. By nine o'clock Wednesday night the crowd began to gather and hitching posts for the thousands of horses were at a pemium. It is estimated that despite the inclement weather at least 5000 people were on the beach enjoying the day.

The catalpa, the tree said to have been recently pointed out to man by the Creator as the tree whose cultivation will stop the depletion of forests, is now to be grown here. The State of Delaware has officially decided to undertake the growth of catalpa trees, upon recommendation of some of the best farmers. Already about 3,000 of these trees have been ordered by the State Board of Agriculture and are set out in various parts of the State, while William H. Ridgway and the other Dover farmers owning timber land in Sussex and lower Kent have begun the culture of these trees extensively.

Rowland G. Cooper, aged 21 years, son of Dr. William H. Cooper, of Kenton, was drowned Friday evening in a stream at Bowers' Beach. He and a party of fellow Delaware College students have been camping there. Just before dark they started for their tent, but could not get their boat. It was proposed that they swim the stream. When in the middle they met with a strong current against which it was hard to combat. After much effort they all got ashore but Cooper. He had become exhausted and sank. An hour later his body was recovered.

The sealed proposals for improving the public highway between Chestertown and Centreville, according to the regular forms furnished by the State Geological Survey Commission, were opened in the office of the Queen Annes County commissioners Tuesday afternoon, and it was found that Stewart & Donahoe, of Wilmington, Del., who were the successful bidders. The work to be done includes the macadamizing and grading of about three miles of road with two stone and concrete bridges. The amount of the bid was $22,896.98 or about $7,662.38 per mile.

GOOD OYSTER SEASON EXPECTED

DOVER, August 17th.—It is stated that there will be better oysters and more of them on the Delaware side of the Delaware Bay during the coming season than for a score of years. The oyster industry at Mahon's is now brisking up and boats are being placed in commission for the opening of the season next month.

There will be thirty-six vessels engaged in oystering this season at Mahon's while smaller fleets will be engaged along the bay at various other points. Of the large fleet Philadelphia will be represented by almost thirty of the thirty-six. The principal Delaware oystermen are Captain John Buckson and Thomas Murray.

ASBURY PARK BOOKLET

The Pennsylvania Railroad Company has just issued an attractive booklet descriptive of Asbury Park. The publication is designed to present the attractions and claims of Asbury Park as a Summer seaside resort.

Persons desiring information concerning this popular resort may obtain a copy of the booklet by enclosing two cents in postage stamps to Geo. W. Boyd, General Passenger Agent, Pennsylvania Railroad, Philadelphia, Pa.

The new, illustrated catalogue of Goldey College is an unusually interesting book of 64 pages, and should be read by every young man and young woman who is looking forward to a business career. It gives full information about the commercial and shorthand courses, contains interesting letters from students and their parents, and is in every respect a most interesting and valuable book for persons who want to get a practical business education.

By order of the trustees of Union M. E. Church, near Townsend, Del:—All persons desiring to see the last resting place of their dear ones and friends will please meet at the church on Tuesday the 22d instant, at 8 o'clock, A. M., to put the grave yard in perfect order, preparatory to holding the annual reunions the first to be held on September, 3d; an all day meeting to be addressed by able orators. Any contribution by friends of the old church will be thankfully received. Can send same to Nicholas Watts or Joseph Hutchison, Townsend, Del., or G. W. Ingram.

Grabbing a roasting ear from a basket in front of a grocery store, stripping off a part of the husk and jabbing your soiled thumb nails into the grains of corn doesn't prove a thing says an exchange. Eight roasting ears properly cooked and served yesterday showeb eight different breeds of corn. No two ears were alike. Small yellow or white grains in both straight and cooked rows; large yellow or white grains straight and crooked. Some of the ears were soft and creamy, while the grains on other ears were like bullets. Can't tell a thing about a roasting ear till you get it salted and buttered and begin gnawing it off the cob.

Dr. Alexander Lowber, secretary of the State, Board of Health, says the general health conditions througout the State are good. He says there is not a case of smallpox in the State at this time, and that diptheria, which has been in evidence in some localities, is subsiding.

"Monday morning was probably high-water market for peaches this season, and Elbertas sold from $1.60 to $2.00 per peach basket. Good white fruit sold from $1.25 to $1.86 per basket. There was about three hundred baskets went from Milford during the day."—Milford Chronicle.

The Public Schools of Middletown will commence the next school year on Tuesday September 5th, but the regular courses of study will not be resumed until the following day, the 6th instant. All parents are requested to see to it that all the children are present on the first day, as enrollment and assignment to classes will be made that date. Even should they have to remain out of school for a few days, it is best that they appear on the day of opening so that seats can be assigned, etc.

A party of fifteen of our young people spent Wednesday at Lore Wood Grove, and reported a delightful trip.

Miss Laura M. Connellee and Master Alfred C. Connellee entertained a large number of their young friends at their home on Green street Thursday afternoon at a "Summer Party." One of the most interesting pastimes of the afternoon was a peanut hunt, in which Miss Charlotte Peverley won first prize and Master Kendall McDowell succeeded in capturing the second. Refreshments were served on the lawn, and the little folks had a delightful afternoon. Among those present were: Helen Shallcross, Nowland Leatherbury, Corrine Mendenhall, Charles Mendenhall, Helen Barnard, Stella Beasten, Frances Beasten, Mildred Allen, Majie Allen, Evelyn Jolls, Helen McDowell, Kendall McDowell, Charlotte Peverley, Edith Shallcross, Nan Shallcross, Lettitia Pool, Margaret Coverdale, Martin Shallcross, Charles Ritchie, Bingham Myers, Pierson Emery, Clarence Pierce, Frank Pierce, Grace Brady, Clara Brady, Adelaide Clayton, Fannie McCrone, Jessie Shepherd, Alice McCoy, Joseph Griffith.

THROUGH OPEN DRAW

NORFOLK, VA., August 17th,—An excursion train from Kinston, N. C., with 169 passengers on board, nearly all of whom were colored, ran into an open draw of a bridge over the Elizabeth river to-day. The first car went into the river. Some of the passengers were rescued by tugs or saved themselves by crawling through windows and swimming ashore.

Thirteen bodies have been taken from the wreck and about 25 injured are being treated. It is believed that 40 or 50 lives were lost.

First reports were that an excursion train carrying 650 whites had been wrecked. This report arose from the fact that this train preceded the colored excursion, but it had taken a siding and was following the wrecked train.

We Shall Have in Operation the Largest and Most Effective

STORE TELEPHONE SERVICE

IN DELAWARE

The volume of business done by telephone has reached such proportions that, while our service has been very efficient, and a great accomodation to thousands of our customers, we have sought a way in which to avoid the annoying little "waits" which are sometimes necessary. The work of extending this service has been underway for sometime, and will be completed on Saturday, August 19th and will be in use the following Monday, August 21st, '05.

The great net work of wires covering city and suburbs and nearby towns, converge at one point in this store—the switchboard on the Third Floor—and our operators in constant attendance, place you in direct communication with any department, any counter, or any salesperson. If you have a 'Phone, you can REACH THE STORE IN A TWINKLING.

This will secure to our customers the greatest facilities for comfortable and satisfactory shopping by 'Phone.

Remember—Free Local Telephone Service to our patrons from any of our store phones

Use the Phone to make and break your engagements and don't forget to say:

AT THE END OF THE CORD

BY HOWARD MARKLE HOKE

One June morning, Whitney Starlamb went to Benton to examine a tract of land that had been advertised for sale, and having closed the deal to his satisfaction, he began to stroll through the pleasant village until the next train should leave for the city. Thinking of the many other transactions of the same sort he expected to make and of the triumphs he hoped to achieve in business by reason of a recent legacy from a wealthy uncle, he was trudging vigorously forward when he heard sobbing, and a short distance from the mouth of a lane he saw a red-white-and-green kite tangled in the branches of an apple-tree, and a boy looking up at it as if the catastrophe had robbed his life of all happiness then and of all hope of it thereafter.

In his own boyhood, kites or anything else mechanical or scientific had no charms for Whitney, and he had not found any in them when he grew up, but the lad's distress went straight to his heart, and he was soon pulling at the white cord. Beyond the swaying of the limb and the untimely fall of a few rambos, there was no result. Then he promptly climbed the fence, and in ten minutes restored the kite to the boy; who childlike, was making off with it without thanks when Whitney stopped him.

"Here, kid," he said, "I'll help you fly it, but we'll go out into the street where there is more breeze."

The kite rose bouyantly into the June air, and just as it did so a hand was laid on Whitney's arm. He found beside him a trim little man of about fifty-five, with iron-gray hair curling from under his broad-brimmed straw hat, and a piquantly youthful and genial smile upon his face, which was clean-shaven and rosy with health.

"I saw it all, my good sir," he cried, "and it did my heart good."

"Oh, that was nothing at all," Whitney answered. "I suppose you are the boy's father?"

"No, I am not," the little man answered, with twinkling. "I am Christopher Finn, and if you have ever heard of my work with kites, you will see why I am so delighted with the way you helped the lad."

Now, manlike, Whitney did not wish to have a stranger think that he had been touched by a boy's mishap, and, having no idea that a trifling pretense could have any other result than a momentary pleasing of the old gentleman, he replied that he had not only been wild over kites when he was a boy himself, but that his enthusiasm was still flying in a spanking breeze.

"I cannot tell you how glad I am to hear that," Chistopher Finn said, with a boyish laugh. "I meet a fellow kiteman so seldom that my meeting with you is a rare good fortune. How would you like to come and look at my kites?"

Still seeing no reason why he should not use up his time in pleasing the old gentleman, Whitney said he would like nothing better, and they walked together out into the country. They came presently to an ivy-covered stone house, of ample size and architectural beauty, set in extensive grounds about a mile from the village, and Christopher ushered Starlamb into the gateway with the elated ceremony of honoring a distinguished guest.

As they walked up a stone path, Whitney made a discovery that lifted the incident from mild boredom into a steady and exhilarating current of human interest. In a gown of fluffy pink, a young woman sat in a willow rocker upon the wide porch, and presenting to the pages of a book face that would have more than repaid the author of them for his toil. Whitney hoped very much that Christopher would forget his kites and present him to her, but, having no eyes for anything so commonplace as a young woman in pink or any other becoming tint, he hurried his guest around the house to a detached building that proved to be his kite-shop.

There he was delightedly pointing out to Whitney the comparative bouyancy and drifting qualities of sugar, triangular, octagonal and tetrahedron cells, when a voice called "Father" from outside the open doorway.

Chistopher scowled, but Whitney had observed a pink light in the doorway and made a hopeful guess as to who was reflecting it.

"I am expecting a caller this morning, Mr. Starlamb, and I shall have to go," Christopher said, reluctantly. But I trust you will not go away until I have shown you my big new kite npstairs. Will you wait?

"Of course I will," Starlamb accepted eagerly, noting that the doorway was still pink with promise. "I would not think of going without seeing your new kite. It would be a severe disappointment."

They went out and with a few words of explanation, Christopher introduced his daughter as casually as he would have used any other ordinay expedient; but Whitney needed only one glance into Elizabeth Finn's alert countenance, and only one flash of her black eyes, to know that she was very far from being ordinary as an expedient or in any other capacity.

She extended her hand to him in a very frank and friendly way and inquired if he would be pleased to walk about the grounds until her father should return. He was about to accept in the sprightly and capable manner of the real Whitney Starlamb, who by wealth, position and experience was amply able to hold his own with the prettiest and liveliest young woman, but he checked himself in time. To the Finns he was not the real Whitney Starlamb at all, but a young kiteman who was supposed to have his mind constantly fixed upon scientific riddles and to regard strolling with young women in spicy June weather as a sinful waste of God-given opportunities. Of course, Elizabeth Finn knew perfectly well how to act with a young kiteman, but Whitney had not the remotest idea how a young kiteman should act with a young woman whose eyes flashed mischief with every word she said. So, with an amused realization of the situation he had been led into, he accepted the invitation in the solemn manner that he supposed would characterize a youthful kiteman.

"Father did not tell me much about you, Mr. Starlamb," Elizabeth Finn said, with customary frankness, "but I take it that you are an enthusiast about kites."

If she had been less beautiful, and if he had not supposed that she was an enthusiastic kitewoman and that their common interest in flyers would hasten the acquaintance he already desired, he would have told the truth; but as it was, he replied:

"Kites have given me a vast deal of pleasure, Miss Finn. There is incalculable promise in them; never so much, it seems to me, as there is this morning."

"I am pleased to hear you say so," she went on, with alluring candor, "and I am as much pleased that you came as father seems to be."

"Then you are also deeply interested in kites?" he said.

"I am nothing of the sort, and I do not wish anyone to think I am for a moment," she answered, with a sprightly laugh. "I am so tired of kite, kite, kite, morning, noon and evening, that I often wish a robust typhoon or other capable breeze would blow them all into—well, wherever the hurricane or tornado might be going, and take father's interest along with them. You don't understand, do you?"

"No, Miss Finn, I confess I do not."

"Very well, then, I will try to explain. I know it is rather difficult to make you scientific men understand ordinary affairs, so I will try hard to make you see that it is just because I am not interested in kites that I am so glad you came. To start with, I pity father very much because he has no one to talk to who is as much interested in the subject as he is. I have often thought that, for his sake, I would pretend to be interested, but I so healtily dislike pretenses of all sorts that if I should put myself to the nervous strain and punish my sense of right by making a pretense, it would be of something a very great deal more important than kites. You have made a very great many of them, I suppose, Mr. Starlamb."

"Well, now," Whitney answered, with some bewilderment, "I can't boast that I have made a very great many."

"But I do hope, for father's sake that you are especially intereisted in their scientific possibilities."

"Oh, yes, that is just what I am," he answered, seeing that if he wished, as he certainly did, to pursue an acquaintance with this young woman who appeared so well worth it, but who so heartily disliked pretenses, he would have to act his role to the best of his ability. "I am far better at that than the mechanical part."

"I cannot tell you how that pleases me, but I will try to make you see why," Elizabeth went on. "My cousin, Dorothy Finn, lives with us, and she is enough interested in kites to give father a certain amount of pleasure and companionship, but she is not one bit scientific—women seldom are, as you may or may not have observed—so that if you are interested principally in the science of kite-flying you will be of great assistance to father, if——"

At that moment a lively hail came to them, and, impatiently expecting to see Christopher, Whitney turned; but he saw instead a young man of attractive appearance hurrying toward them across the lawn. When he arrived, Elizabeth introduced him as Alton Latshaw; but she did not explain who or what he was, Whitney inferred that he was to consider the omission as a notice to him that Latshaw had an interest in herself that had enjoyed a privileged growth.

"Mr. Starlamb and father were discussing kites when they were interrupted by a call," she explained, with a haste that confirmed Whitney's inference. "I am doing my best, but my experience with men like father is that they think there is no satifactory substitute for a kite."

"Ah, you fly kites, do you?" Latshaw asked with an admirable balance of politeness and contempt.

"There is an exhilaration in the tug of a kite on the cord that is indescribable," Whitney declared, with a spirit that he thought that a kiteman would show. "The pull of a bass on a split bamboo is nothing to it."

Just then a door opened near them and a young woman, prettier in some respects than Elizabeth, came out. In one hand she held a tiny glue-pot, an airy kite-eell made of pine sticks and white cheesecloth. Elizabeth introduced her as her cousin Dorothy, explaining that Mr. Starlamb was a strenuous kiteman whom her father had accidently met on the street that morning.

"I am certainly pleased to see you here," Dorothy Finn said. "You will be a godsend to Uncle Christopher. He has run against a serious difficulty in the construction of his new kite, and if you could suggest a solution of it, you would help him very much."

Whitney was replying that he would be glad to do his best, when Christopher hurried from the house and conducted him and Dorothy to the second floor of the workshop, where a monster kite of white cloth and pine frame, of cell upon cell, and wide-spreading wings lay unfinished.

"I mean to test the power of a kite to fly at an angle against the wind," Christopher explained, "and I want to put a rudder-tail to this one, but I do not yet see how to do it so that it can be manipulated by a second cord from the ground. I hope very much Mr. Starlamb, that you can give me some valuable suggestions."

The old kiteman eagerly scanned Whitney's face as if he hoped that his guest would be struck by an instant inspiration, while near by Dorothy gave him a scrutiny that made the moment critical for his future acquaintance with Elizabeth. But Whitney had never done anything more scientific or mechanical than spinning a top, and he had done that unskillfully, so that he felt very much like a badly equipped flying muachine trying to beat against a stiff breeze.

"Do you know that this is positively extraordinary?" he cried at last. "You must be surprised when I tell you that at this very time I am trying to solve that identical problem. This makes me hopeful, Mr. Finn, that we can combine our ingenuity and solve it successfully. But I see it is my train time. I will bid you good-by now, and, if you will permit me, I will come back soon and give you the best ideas I can think of in the mean time."

During the next few days, Starlamb gave scarcely a thought to the problem that Christopher Finn wished to solve, for he knew that he could no more attach a rudder-tail to a kite than he could bring on a transit of Venus or an eclipse of the moon; but he did think a great deal of the situation in which his pretense had put him, and the more he thought of it and of his lack of mechanical ability to meet it, the firmer was his conviction that he should never see Christopher Finn again or the two Finn girls. But what is human conviction against a feminine persuasion in exquisite pink?

When he returned to Benton, he found Christopher bubbling with joy in his kite-shop. After he had demonstrated how he had decided to fasten the rudder-tail to the kite, Whitney expressed his gratification and approval in the most enthusiastic terms. He waxed so eloquent in his prophecy that aerial navigation was about to be solved, that the little old kiteman's face seemed to be contorted with triumph; and when Whitney went on to state that he had also thought of a plan to fix the tail to the kite but it was so inferior that he would not even mention it, Christopher grasped his hand and said with a quaver in his voice:

"What should I have done if I had not met you that morning, Mr. Starlamb?"

"It is indeed wonderful how things happen for the best in this world," Whitney responded, with a fairly convincing quaver in his own voice.

After this, Whitney went to Benton every other morning in his automobile. Of course, he did not care whether the new kite, which Dorothy had named "The Gull," ever made an angle against the breeze, or whether it would fly at all, but he did care a great deal to learn the status of Alton Latshaw, who had considerately gone to spend a few weeks on his ranch in Arizona. As the days went by and he had many talks with Elizabeth, he wished more and more to learn about this. It might seem to have been perfectly natural for Dorothy or Christopher to say just what that status was, but they appeared to regard it as a fact so fixed and determined that it never occurred to them to mention it, particularly to a young man whose thoughts were always high above love and its linkings.
